Assessing the impact of enhanced access to mental health care on consumers' recovery from personal crisis: a natural experiment. The first crisis intervention service was established in Australia in the early 1990s, when there were serious concerns about the rising incidence of suicide among young people. The suicide rate among young people has since decreased substantially. However, many young people experience a personal crisis in their lives and it is possible that this may have an adverse effect on their recovery from stress. In this paper we assess the impact of the introduction of the first crisis intervention service on the psychological recovery of young people from personal crisis. The study used a quasi-experimental design, with households of young people aged 15 to 24 years from two National Health Survey surveys prior to the implementation of crisis services in South Australia in 1995-96 (n = 1719, 49% response) and from two follow-up surveys in 1998 (n = 1562, 57% response) and 2003 (n = 1046, 53% response). The sample was restricted to those who had experienced a personal crisis and participated in both the 1998 and 2003 surveys. A constant-cohort design was used to assess pre-and post-intervention changes in psychological and behavioural problems using a person-weighted, multi-state, multinomial logistic regression model. There was a reduction in the incidence of personal crisis in 1995-96 and 2003 for all young people studied. The findings suggest that the development of crisis intervention services in South Australia was associated with a significant reduction in problem behaviour. However, the results do not support a causal relationship between the decrease in the prevalence of problem behaviour and the introduction of crisis services. This study provides further evidence for the benefits of early recognition and comprehensive crisis intervention services for young people.
