Usually I would say, "There are thousands of kids out there who are just as smart and/or creative as I am. Why me?" But that would be an insult to the hundreds of others who have as much, if not more talent and skill than I do. Yesterday, someone nominated me to be a finalist in the Write to Publish contest. (I was up against 11 other people. I think we got chosen on the last day of voting.) According to their website, there are 15,000 books published every year in the U.S. and the total number has been going up at a rate of 1.5 books per minute. Considering how long it takes me to write a couple of sentences here on the blog, this is mind-boggling. You know, it's like they say, "You have to write what you know" for a reason. There are very few people who can do what I do--that is, write a novel. And if you take away from me what I have to offer, what will be left? No, I have to say that this is wonderful and it's a great honor. I am humbled and flattered by the nomination. This came just as the Senate was debating the proposed health care reform bill. So, thank you, Mr. and Mrs. and Mister President for your continued support of the arts and literature and for this wonderful opportunity. Friday, August 22, 2009 No, I didn't hear the news when it came in. I was out of town and my brother called and told me. This was the text that I received: "The healthcare bill passed, just a week after we were elected. We have to pass it to see what's in it. AHHHHHH!" Yes, this is the message that my mom sent to the world via the text-to-voice feature of my iPhone. Now
