In the future, businesses will thrive only if they place as much importance on their social and environmental impact as they do on their financial results. As might be expected, entrepreneurs quickly noticed that in competition with large companies, which spend more on charity than on any other cause, they were left to compensate for their small impact on the environment. The business idea that we should be active "obsessive" philanthropists proved extremely unpopular. As a result, many businessmen have focused on minimizing their company's impact on the environment. But some - and very few - continue to support the communities that need their help most, even if they donate less than they would if they were doing it out of pure altruism. The Life Line Charitable Foundation is just such an organization. For more than 6 years, the foundation has worked with private investors and has solicited funding and donations from individuals. During this time, it has been able to help more than 350 children under the age of 18.
